

David Bond is an international facilitator, executive leadership coach, and retreat leader, who works as a catalyst for substantive change. He has worked in the Americas, Asia, Africa, and Europe, and he draws on over 25 years of global experience with executives, senior leadership teams, and organizations in transition. David is particularly skilled at working with the complex, relational aspects of leadership effectiveness and team change: promoting inclusive collaboration, harvesting multiple perspectives, establishing a thinking environment, overcoming immunity to change, and leveraging diversity. He strives to model mindful leadership driven by deep purpose and the belief that serving the common good serves organizations and businesses.

David is based in the USA; he works independently and in association with major business schools and leadership consultancies. He is a senior consultant with Spiro Coaching Institute and Liz De Wet Leadership Development, a facilitator, educator, and coach on a range of courses and programs at Kenan-Flagler Business School, UNC and Duke University Health System. David's current focus is in Healthcare and Higher Education, where he is playing an active role in training and facilitating Inclusive and Courageous Conversations about Race and Diversity and Navigating Complexity.

David's executive clients and program participants have come from a variety of organizations and sectors, such as the Duke University Health System, Johnson & Johnson, Colleges of the Fenway, the United Nations, and various public sector and non-profit agencies in South Africa, the United Kingdom, and Europe. He has also had international leadership roles in the educational sector. David is an internationally accredited executive coach and holds an MSC, an MA (cum laude), and MSSci.
